This May Sound stupid , but this is a secret of apple stores and Best buy stores ,That actually Works! And Christmas is Coming The Lucky People That Have One (or Those That Are GOing TO Receive One ) Know how to properly clean it's screen. Remember that iPhone And iPod Touch's Screen Are Made of a Glass-like material , so , the solution for cleaning those bad-looking grease spots and fingerprints is (drums please ... xp) Use glass cleaner!! simple as that!! This technique is purely optional , it does need to be done , but once every two or three weeks or maybe months , after all your devices are yours BONUS: The Pictures Have SUPER SIZED pictures feel free to view them zoomed or Full-screenGather Your Materials :Some Drops of your favorite glass cleaner (remeber Use the ammonia free variety , since amonia can ruin the protective coating of Pda's And regular iPodsNEVER USE A CLEANER WITH AMMONIA (read Above Why)Gather your toolsThe cloth included with your iPod touch (iPhone?)A Cotton cloth , You may recycle something OPTIONAL:if Your device uses a case you may want to use a screwdriver or your nails to remove it I use to protect my Touch with a hard plastic case , which really protects it of dust and scratches , anyway some people like to have they're iPhonejods "Naked" xpWipe The Screen Using The iCloth , Just remove big dust particles . (as usual it will not clean it nicely , that's the reason of this how-to)Add A Few drops of window cleaner to the screen , clean the screen with circular motion , and the from side to side (let's do the mario all together now!!) XD , just kidding). Now is as shiny as New , Cool isn't it ?In order to keep the iPod clean for a decent amount of time , clean the cover too (if you use one ) using the same method , clean both inner and outer PartsReplace The Top Part Of Case , And Enjoy Your Hard Job . Show To your friends Your (jailbroken?) iPod touch . Thanks For Reading! Hope This Was Useful! Oh , And reward yourself with a Burrito . Tasty! Several days a week, I head over to a local nature preserve for a little fast-paced walking. This green space has been protected for a number of years now, so the local fauna have little fear of the numerous humans who traipse through their home. I often encounter runners, hikers and bicyclists cruising the roads and trails. One morning, I heard a rustling near a large tree that stood alone in a meadow, and saw a bobcat standing at the base of the tree, calmly returning the gaze of the strangers who oohed and aahed at it. Lately, though, I've seen increasing numbers of people with those ubiquitous white wires coming out of their ears. Often, I'll nod and say "Good Morning", before I realize they've got earbuds in, and can't hear me. I'm sure someone has written about how the iPod and other digital music players are just another example of technology creating an increasingly alienated culture, but that's probably too simplistic. My older daughter, Elizabeth, is a heavy iPod user, as are many of her friends, and I don't see any evidence of alienation beyond the usual teenage angst that occasionally surfaces. I'm perhaps more worried about evidence of earbuds causing hearing loss. I personally don't like earbuds, mostly because my ears seemed to be shaped in such a way that they always fall out. So I'll use either over-the-ear phones, such as Sennheiser PX200's, or earphones, such as the Shure e3c. I've encouraged my daughter to use over-the-ear phones, too. She thought most were pretty dorky, but after checking out the Logitech Curve phones, they apparently passed the "coolness" muster.Part of the issue with earbuds seems to be that they let in too much sound from the outside world, so people crank up their music even louder. While teenagers in the past have cranked up music too loudly, today's digital music players allow users to have 100+ dB music played into their ear canal all day long. Apple must think that there's something to this, given their recent release of that lets users set the maximum volume setting to something less than thunderous. There's even a parental password feature, so parents can enforce volume limits. Or the new firmware update could just be Apple's belated response to being sued on the topic.While a generation of partially deaf people is not a good thing, the iPod and its competitors, plus the wealth of online music services have opened up a huge universe of music to people. It's pretty amazing what I hear coming out of Elizabeth's room some days. It's not all contemporary stuff by any means. Throw in the phenomenon of podcasting, which is certainly a new spin on an old medium. Like blogs, podcasting opens up audio commentary to a mass market: You no longer have to be a broadcaster working in a radio station to get your voice heard. Continued... Reader ricketycricket modeled this extremely minimal, white home screen off a simple wallpaper from the Mass Effect series and lots of home screen gestures. Here's how. We'll leave it to ricketycricket to explain:I'm a huge fan of the Mass Effect games. When I found this image, I knew I had to design a home screen around it, so I modified the image slightly in GIMP to fit my layout. Since I am partial to the minimal look I rely heavily on gestures to simplify things and keep a clean homescreen. Here's what I use:Clock Widget: mClock with a modified version of the Essence theme (slightly NSFW photos)The dock icons all have "swipe up" gestures. The Phone icon starts the phone when tapped, and Google Voice when swiped. The SMS icon starts Gmail when swiped, the Music icon starts Pandora, Chrome starts Facebook, and the Camera app starts Instagram—all in addition to their default apps when tapped.Other gestures I've added include:Tap the home button from the home screen to open voice searchSwipe up to open app drawerSwipe down to expand notificationsTwo-finger swipe up/down to show/hide notification barDouble tap to open settingsPinch out to open contactsPinch in to open Nova settingsDo you have an awesome, tweaked-into-oblivion home or lock screen of your own that you'd like to share? Go ahead and post it on the #homescreenshowcase forum with a description of how you made it and it may be the next featured home screen.The White Space Home Screen | #homescreenshowcase This solves about 3 ipod need to knows that you need to knowONE: if you were to double click the home button, you bring up a window with the play/pause, skip or backup song choicesTWO:if you are writing anywhere within the ipod, at the end of a sentence you can space 2 times and it leaves a period and a space. THREE: if you press and hold the top power button and the home button you take an automatic screenshot even when you are playing apps.Thanks for reading my top 3 NEED TO KNOWS about the ipod touch. I recently bought a 3.5mm stereo plug to connect my 1GB iPod Nano to the Eclipse CD-5423 head unit in my car. My deck, despite being an older model, is relatively iPod-friendly right out of the box. It comes with a rear auxiliary input, a jog lever for navigating long track lists, and is capable of displaying text information like ID3 tags and radio station titles. While I don't consider myself a "golden-eared" (or even "" audiophile), 128kbps MP3s leave me wanting, sometimes aching (literally) for more. At that compression, even Apple's white standard issue earbuds are only bearable for relatively short bursts. Projecting music through a decent car stereo is a different story altogether. I'm accustomed to CD-quality music in the car, and lossy MP3s don't really do it for me. Apple Lossless is spot on, but the file sizes are a bit hefty for the wee 1GB Nano. I've found 320kbps AAC is a good compromise, and I can probably go lower without consciously noticing a difference, but I'm sticking with it for now. The issue with connecting the iPod via the auxiliary cable connection is control: You still have to advance tracks and select playlists with the iPod itself. Unlike most car stereos with their illuminated buttons and tactile knobs, the tiny black Nano isn't well suited for use while driving. Mine currently occupies a dimly lit niche in front of the shifter near the ashtray, making the buttons difficult to see at night. Before I can even get the backlight on, I'm fumbling around with the controls, changing the volume when I'm trying to advance to the next track or vice versa. Forget about switching playlists while keeping your attention on the road. I also have to remember to power down the iPod whenever I reach my destination before getting out of the car. All of these tasks should be handled with the head unit—that's what it's there for. It has a lot more buttons and it's better suited for this purpose. Continued... Sony planning bigger White Magic screens Sony has explained to TechRadar why its flagship White Magic screen technology was not used on the high end Sony Xperia S device.The new display (found on the Sony Xperia P) uses a new method of pixel powering to allow much greater visibility in direct sunlight, and questions were raised over why the technology wasn't used in the flagship device. A Sony spokesperson told us it was simply a limitation of size and the company's desire to preserve the user experience:"We're always looking at how we can take our technology to the next level, but we can't use White Magic in a bigger screen just yet."We could physically use it [on the Xperia S], but basically the pixels too far apart [to offer the correct level of picture quality on a larger device].""We don't want to say we just have the brighter screen; we want to offer great pictures and great contrast to make content look great, and that's the thing were playing about with."However, we are investigating ways to improve the technology, as we always want to optimise for future products."So it seems that while the likes of the Xperia S won't ever get the next generation of screen capabilities from the development team, we might be seeing HD versions of White Magic displays in the near future.
