By John Mack Freeman the text image of Ewe Degiampietro from Fotolia.com Full-text refers to online periodicals that reproduce the entire content of online articles in a searchable format. Full-text may have some restrictions depending on the editor and database within which the file is located. The full-text is defined in the context of the online resources from the Duke University library as a resource that has the entire text available online for reading and searching instead of a simple quote or abstract. The full text can be applied to a single article, a whole periodical or a database of periodicals accessible to the Internet. Full-text files include all the original data provided in the original online periodical, including footnotes, pictures and bibliographical information. Depending on the restrictions on some materials of origin, the full text cannot be available for all materials online at the same time. "Active full text" means that a periodical has a full text until the current date, "full text" usually refers to the full text of an article that is provided until a given date. "Embargoed" files only allow full text after a given date set by the editor. Although not everyone is 100% sure for what a specific abbreviation stands for, most are quite common that if you see the abbreviation once, you will see it again in another forum. The abbreviations we use in the text and on the internet are not as new as they may seem. Some such as ASAP and FYI precede the internet for decades. Others were created in the first days of the internet. Many of these abbreviations were created before the Internet went mainstream or He was gaining popularity. In 1989, the World Wide Web officially launched. However, there were already people connecting to the early versions in the 1980s. At the time, people communicated Usenet. It's been for years that Usenet is the main way people communicate on the internet, but its legacy lives. The terms and abbreviations created on those message boards remain in common use. You could see the expression "PMSL" on a fun post in an international online discussion forum, and makes you quit and wonder: What exactly does PMSL mean? PMSL Stands for: P**sed Myself Laughing Lifewire / Derek Abella Someone who writes PMSL found something incredibly fun. Other expressions expressing laugh and humor include ROFLMAO ("to run down, laugh my ** off") and LOL ("to laugh loudly"). Like most internet jargon, expression is not suitable for most commercial relationships. PMSL is best used in personal text, email, online chat, or in particular circumstances where a business knowledge has become a friend. Both the upper and lowercase versions of PMSL (pmsl) mean the same thing and are perfectly acceptable. When you write or communicate online, be careful not to type whole sentences in capital, as this transmits screaming and is considered rude. (User 1) OMG! You just spit the coffee on my keyboard and monitor! (User 2) ROFL @ Jim! Bwahahahahaha! (User 3) PMSL! Never drink anything when Greg is telling stories about his camping trips! Haha! I have a good one. ROFL! (User 1) Have you heard of the new corduroy pillows? They're making titles everywhere! (User 2) PMSL! BWAHA PMSL is of British origin. There are cases of the PMSL acronym used online since 2000. The expression PMSL has gained popularity with European football fans sites as footballers would tell comic accidents in their football matches, or when the opponent's team would suffer a kind of indignity or amusing defeat. PMSL, like many other online expressions and web lingo, is part of the culture of online conversation and is a way for cultural identity through playful language and conversation. roflmao (rolling on floor laughing) roflmao (rolling on floor laughing my a** off) roflcopter (rolling on floor laughing, turning like a helicopter) lulz (drawing out loud) lol (laughing out loud) lmao (back my a** off) lulz (version of laughing out loud) bwaharis Capitalization is a non-concern when using text abbreviations and chat jargon. Use all capital letters (pmsl) or all lowercase letters (pmsl) and meaning is identical. correct punctuation is similar to a non-concern with most shortcuts of text messages. For example, the acronym of "too long, did not read" can be TL;DR or tldr. both are acceptable. never use periods (points) between the letters of the acronym; it would defeat the purpose of being a shortcut. For example, rofl would never have been written R.O.F.L. and tyl! ("talk to you later") would never be T.T.Y.L. when you try to oate the jargon in the messages, evaluate who is the audience, whether the context is informal or professional, and then use good judgment. if you know someone well and it is a personal and informal communication, then absolutely hate abbreviations. on the flip side, if you are just starting a friendship or a professional relationship, avoid shortcuts until you have developed a relationship. if you post it in a professional context with someone at work, or with a customer or supplier outside your company, avoid the abbreviations entirely. spelling out complete words shows professionalism and courtesy. is much smarter for err on the side of being too professional at the beginning, and then relax the over time organically. organically. organically. what does km mean in text message. what does km mean in text talk
