Perhaps this complaint of the top VC Marc Andreessen sounds familiar:"[Y]ou know those days when you are running all day and doing things and talking to people and making calls and you are completely exhausted and you are running all day and doing things and talking to people and making calls and filling the paperwork and you are running all day and doing things and talking to people and making calls and filling the paperwork and you are completely exhausted and you are completely ex apparently VC) knows, the business does not necessarily translate into a sense of realization. Many of us respond to this problem with that confident tool, the list of doing. If we could prioritize our duties, we think, so nothing falls through cracks or disturbs us unexpectedly, we will certainly do more. How's it going? This is the question posed by a new ebook since iDoneThis productivity is started. It suggests entrepreneurs to make a simple replacement for the inefficacy, anxiety-induction a-do list: Try using a 'Done List' instead. With the company's name, you can probably guess iDoneThis might have a stake in supporting the idea, but the book does a convincing case for why a made list beats a list of doing any day. If personal experience has not already convinced you what is in your list of things to do and what you spend your time rarely aligning, then iDone This has a lot of statistics to prove it to you. The data collected by the company's productivity app shows that 41 percent of the list items to be made is never done, and only 15 percent of the completed activities have ever been in a list to be made first. Thanks to their smal performance as deposits for ongoing tasks, the lists of doing end up being a warehouse of the unfinished and a continuous source of concern that we are not carrying out enough." Psychologists Robert Emmons and Laura King discovered that the anxiety resulting from having too many contrasting goals causes our productivity and physical and mental health to suffer," the book reports, "so the list to do gives and takes. It helps us remember the many things we have to face. At the same time, it is an intaxing tool that can induce unhealthy and disarming anxiety. "The solution to this problem recommended by Andreessen is the same as the one recommended bythe list of making and replacing it with a record of all your small wins and results instead. As Andreessen explains, using this technique means that "every time you do something, you can write it and get that little rush of endorphins that the mouse gets every time you pressbutton in his cage and gets a pellet of food. "It seems like a waste of time, you might object. Why would I spend time writing things I've already done? but the research discussed in the ebook testifies that andreessen is on something. spend some moments reflecting on what you have achieved ends up making you more productive at the end of your energy levels. "It seems counter-spilient to spend more time to do another thing - but to stock up what you have accomplished provides critical fuel. harvard business school professor teresa amabile and psycholistist steven kramer, authors of the incisive of the principle of progress, brought over 12,000 voices of the daily work journal and were surprised to find that making progress - even small victories - on a significant job is the most powerful motivator is the most powerful motivator "sign the book. if a list of things to do is a sucking energy," your list made turns you on, " concludes the ebook.
